House Healing Adventures

Heidi Petersen

Do you ever blame yourself when things in your house break? Maybe you have thought, "What did I do to deserve this?" or, simply, "Why is this happening to me?" When things do not go according to our plans, we can feel, as though the world is crashing down around us, or, at least, that the universe is not on our side.

Here is the story of a woman who requested a house healing for exactly these reasons. Meg, (not her real name, of course), had been diagnosed with rheumatoid arthritis. Shortly following her diagnosis, she sold her beloved two-story home, buying a ranch-style house in a less expensive neighborhood. Her stated reasons for buying the new house: 'it will be easier for me to get around in a house with no stairs; with minor repairs, I'll be able to rent out one of the bedrooms; it will be inexpensive for me to live here; and it can serve as a simple support system while I heal physically.'

The new house was easier to get around in. However, those simple repairs became an expensive and involved remodeling ordeal. Adding a window uncovered that the pipes were old, the electrical wiring was improperly installed and the insulation was newspaper—which is not only a fire hazard, but also not up to Code. As if this news weren't enough, many of the contractors proved to be unreliable. One of them even skipped town without completing the work to which he had agreed. All of this hassle had led Meg to believe that she had made a dire mistake in purchasing this house. After four years of living there, without any tenant to help with the payments, she was ready for some communication about the property, and her relationship to it.

First, I looked to see what good was manifesting in her situation. I discovered that she was in the process of moving her illness from her body into her house, where she could "fix" it. All of the repairs, which had seemed cumbersome and excessive, were part of her physical healing. While she was concerned that the attention that she was focusing on her house may be preventing her recovery, I explained that it was intimately related to her recovery. Each time she rolled up her sleeves, and went to work on her house, she was aiding the healing of her body. The house healing could have been stopped at that point; she had gained the information that she needed. She brightened up, and said, "I've never felt healthier than I do in this house." As it turns out, she had moved into the ideal house to nourish her healing. It was not a mistake after all.

Likewise, if you find yourself in an unexpected situation in which it is difficult to discern the good, remember Meg. Know that the universe works to promote healing in each of us through the amazing situations that we encounter.
